Burley Cottage is the only other early brick structure in Berlin beside Burley Manor. It is a fine late Georgian Cottage, one-and-a-half stories tall, five bays long and three bays deep with an "A" roof. The west facade has one of the three unusual porches of Berlin, three bays long with modillions and dog tooth design along the lower edge of the arched facade. It has doric columns supporting the shed type roof, as does the plain porch on the entire length of the east facade. The central door has arched fanlight and wood trim. At second floor level is a small brick pediment with bull's eye window, the whole of which is flanked by two "A" roof dormers which have six over six sash and trim with corner blocks. The east side has no pediment. Window lintels appear to be made of wood and shaped like a dove-tail (or typical flat arch without keystone). Sash on first story are twelve over twelve and those in the gables of the second story are twelve over eight. In the gable is also a supra-attic window with six over six sash. On each gable are two very tall brick chimneys supported from the roof by iron rods and capped by a brick vault to shed the water and keep it from entering the chimney.
